Canada's open-immigration program is causing culture clash with Syrian refugees, as exemplified by a Muslim family that throws rocks at Canadian children. In a second case, a female member of parliament is criticized for speaking out against a Syrian refugee who battered his wife with a hockey stick and for criticizing the open-border policy. Canada's Immigration Minister, Achmed Hussen, said that Leitch's tweet was "as disgraceful as domestic violence itself."

Death Threats and Violence Have Radicalized the Left

US: Democrats are silent on threats from the radicalized left against Republicans, Caucasians, and Trump. Hillary Clinton tweeted that Republicans are the death party if they pass the new healthcare bill, and Senator Elizabeth Warren accused the GOP of trying to kill Americans for money with the new bill. The rhetoric of violence leads to actual violence.

Germany Enforces Political Correctness by Raiding the Homes of 36 People Who Posted Comments on Facebook

German authorities raided the homes of 36 people who posted Internet comments that could upset someone. Germany, not only pursues the authors of these comments, but also is considering punishing the social-media sites that publish those comments. The law now being drafted would fine Facebook, Twitter, and other social-media outlets as much as $56 million if they fail to remove the so-called hate speech.

This week, Germany launched a major crackdown on free expression. In 36 simultaneous raids across multiple states, German authorities sought evidence for speech-related criminal offenses based on things people posted on the Internet.

Most of these offenses come under incitement to racial hatred laws. That might sound good to some, but it isn't.

There's a major difference between U.S. and German incitement laws. U.S. law – at federal and state levels – criminalizes only incitement that is designed to foster imminent unlawful violence. The incitement must also be likely to lead to unlawful violence. This three-prong test means that saying "I [expletive] hate [racial/religious/social group] and think they should all burn," for example, is not illegal in America.

And Americans take that for granted. But such postings would be illegal in Germany and in much of Europe.

In the U.K., the Public Order Act mandates that, "A person is guilty of an offense if he uses threatening [or abusive] words or behavior ... within the hearing or sight of a person likely to be caused harassment, alarm or distress thereby." Importantly, proven intention and actual harm are not necessary for conviction. It is enough that the speech possibly alarmed someone nearby.

Consider what impact that law might have on the willingness of individuals to discuss sensitive issues like immigration, or abortion, or terrorism? It is a recipe for chilled speech.

Amazingly, however, Germany takes things further, proactively punishing speech that might feasibly upset someone on the Internet. Which, if you've ever been on the Internet, could be said of almost everything on it.

The head of Germany's Federal Criminal Police Office, Holger Münch, explained the government's position. "Our free society must not allow a climate of fear, threat, criminal violence and violence either on the street or on the Internet.” Again, think carefully on those words. Germany seeks not simply to punish offending speech, but to “not allow a climate” of offense.

To accomplish this objective, Germany isn’t simply arresting speakers, it is punishing the platforms of speech. As Germany’s Justice Minister, Heiko Mass, put it, “We need to increase the pressure on social media companies.” Mass is referring to a draft law that would impose $56 million fines on Facebook, Twitter and other social media companies, if they fail to remove offending speech within a short period. As I’ve noted, similar legislation is also being considered in Britain.

There’s an immensely pathetic quality to this authoritarianism. Such coordinated efficiency and absent restraint raises troubling parallels with another era in German history.

Muslim Rape Gangs in UK

Protected by Political Correctness in Spite of Having Victimized One-million Children

Muslim rape gangs, known as 'grooming gangs', have sexually assaulted as many as one-million Caucasian children in Great Britain since the late 1980s. Girls, as young as nine years old are lured to the gangs with drugs and groomed to become drug-addicted prostitutes and subjected to gang rape. They are threatened with death if they try to flee. The media and childcare professionals are cowed into silence by the fear of being called racist. Despite some arrests, the gangs are still operating.

Syria: 17 Children Paralyzed by Polio Vaccine, So UN Wants to Vaccinate 400,000 More

The New York Times reported that at least 17 children have been paralyzed from polio in war-torn Syria. The United Nations' World Health Organization (WHO) admits that the outbreak was caused by the vaccine! They claim that the vaccine mutated in the waste of the inoculated children and mutated into a stronger strain of the virus and can spread from contaminated water and sewage. A spokesman said there was an urgent need to vaccinate more than 400,000 children under the age of 5 in the area to stop further infection.
