

US State Department Will Pay Hungarian Media Outlets to Promote Mass Immigration in Hungary

The State Department has authorized $700,000 US taxpayer dollars to fund Hungarian media outlets that oppose Prime Minister Orbán's conservative government, which is pushing back against the European Union's policy of mass migration. He also is exposing the European politicians who Soros has called "reliable allies". -GEG

The U.S. State Department has courted controversy by announcing it will plough $700,000 into Hungarian media, angering the country's anti-globalist, conservative government.

The funding was announced by U.S. Chargé d'Affaires David Kostelancik, who has previously appeared to openly criticise the Trump administration by alluding to "apparent inconsistencies in [U.S.] foreign policy" and remarking that "not every criticism of the government is 'fake news'."

Breitbart London spoke to a State Department official who confirmed it supports what it calls "democracy and human rights programming" in many countries, and that its intentions in Hungary – a NATO ally – are to "support media outlets operating outside the capital ... to produce fact-based reporting and increase their audience and economic sustainability”.

The State Department also echoed Kostelancik’s claim that too many Hungarian news outlets are sympathetic to Prime Minister Viktor Orbán’s popular conservative government – which has earned powerful enemies by opposing the European Union on mass migration, building a highly effective border wall, and exposing the network of European politicians deemed “reliable allies” by billionaire open borders campaigner George Soros.

The obvious subtext to all of this is that the State Department funding effort is intended to bolster anti-government and opposition media. This suggests it is still pursuing Obama era, anti-conservative policy objectives internationally in defiance of President Trump, who has praised Prime Minister Orbán – the first European leader to back him – as “strong and brave”.
