San Diego State University suspended American-Indian lecturer, Oscar Monge, from teaching after he threatened to lower a white student's grade when she expressed support for the school's Aztec mascot. Monge said the student's braided hair represented cultural appropriation over Facebook, and called her racist for wearing a t-shirt portraying the mascot. He also said it is easy to argue that whiteness is evil. A school pulled an American Indian professor who discriminated against a white student from the classroom, according to a Monday report.

San Diego State University suspended American Indian lecturer Oscar "Ozzie" Monge from teaching three American Indian writing rhetoric sections after he threatened to lower white student Crystal Sudano's grade when she expressed support for the school's Aztec mascot, reported The College Fix.

Monge "is not teaching any classes this spring semester," SDSU spokeswoman Jill Esterbrooks told The Fix. The California

Department of Justice had previously found Monge guilty of racial discrimination, racial harassment and racial retaliation.

The American Indian lecturer is a vocal advocate for trashing SDSU's Aztec mascot, which he said represents cultural appropriation. Monge said Sudano's braided hair represented cultural appropriation over Facebook, and called the student racist for wearing a t-shirt portraying the mascot. "The AS (Associated Students) is something else that confuses me...the way it's structured, the way it runs and how damned white it is," Monge told the student, critiquing the organization that had voted to keep the mascot.

The lecturer also critiqued Sudano's use of the phrase "totem pole" when the white student said everyone's opinions should be heard "no matter how low on the totem pole you are." Monge's behavior caused Sudano to withdraw from his class, according to the California Department of Justice (DOJ).

A new poll released by Harvard-Harris shows that a staggering percentage of voters on all ends of the political spectrum are overwhelmingly in favor of an immigration deal that would end Chain Migration, eliminate the Visa Lottery, and grant amnesty to DACA recipients.

According to the poll, 65% of voters would support a DACA deal that secures the Southern border, ends Chain Migration, and eliminates the Visa Lottery. A majority of voters from nearly every demographic group would support the deal, including 68% of Hispanic voters, 64% of African American voters, 64% of Democratic voters, 67% of all independent voters, 63% of liberal voters, and 68% of those who voted for Hillary Clinton in the 2016 presidential election cycle.
