

The FAA Is Sacrificing Your Safety for Diversity Due to Obama's Policies

The Federal Aviation Administration recently changed their hiring practices by sacrificing merit for diversity. Tucker Carlson the pointed out that certain standards such as understanding science and math are drastically diluted in the new hiring process that poses a danger because a small mistake could cause many people to die. The FAA's biographical questionnaire gives more weight to people who played a lot of sports in high school instead of trained pilots and those who had experience. The union, National Air Traffic Controllers Association, controls a large PAC (political action committee) that funds politicians.

"At any one time there are 5,000 aircraft above the United States. On 9/11, air traffic controllers guided every one of them to a safe landing in a little over an hour. Go ahead and try that," Carlson said Friday. "It's a job where a small mistake could lead instantly to the deaths of hundreds of people. Not surprisingly, the hiring standards for air traffic controllers were long among the most selective of all federal jobs."

Carlson the pointed out that certain standards such as understanding science and math are drastically diluted in the new hiring process.

Read full article here...