Mark Zuckerberg recently added $100 million to $300 million that was previously donated to the nonprofit Center for Tech and Civic Life (CTCL) that has ties to the Democrat party. The money is meant to finance elections administrators around the country and beef up coronavirus safety measures at polling places. Two dozen states have applied for the funds. A lawsuit from Wisconsin was brought against the funding of election administrators, alleging that Zuckerberg's grant money was tantamount to bribery, arguing it would be used to unevenly boost voter turnout in Democratic districts. US District Judge William Griesbach stating that he found no legal reason to bar cities in Wisconsin from receiving the donated funds, although he did note that the private cash presents a risk of "skewing" the vote. Similar suits have been launched in a number of battleground states in the 2020 race, including Michigan, Minnesota, Iowa and Pennsylvania, where grant money is also on offer for local elections offices.

Facebook boss Mark Zuckerberg will donate another $100 million to aid election officials around the US after an initial $300 million grant was ruled lawful by a federal judge despite warning that the money could distort the vote.

A lawsuit challenging the grant scheme in Wisconsin was struck down on Wednesday, with US District Judge William Griesbach stating that he found no legal reason to bar five major cities in the state from receiving $6.3 million from the donated funds. However, Griesbach noted in his decision that the private cash could potentially influence the outcome of the election.

The risk of skewing an election by providing additional private funding for conducting the election in certain areas of the state may be real.

“The record before the court, however, does not provide the support needed for the court to make such a determination, especially in light of the fact that over 100 additional Wisconsin municipalities received grants as well,” he added.

Initially brought by the Wisconsin Voters Alliance last month, the suit alleged Zuckerberg’s grant money was tantamount to bribery, arguing it would be used to unevenly boost voter turnout in Democratic districts across the five Wisconsin cities – Green Bay, Kenosha, Madison, Milwaukee and Racine. Similar suits have been launched in a number of battleground states in the 2020 race, including Michigan, Minnesota, Iowa and Pennsylvania, where grant money is also on offer for local elections offices.

Denver: New Evidence Emerges in Case of Patriot Who Was Shot to Death

Denver, Colorado: Matthew Dolloff, who was working as an armed security guard for a local news station, has been charged with second degree murder in the killing of Lee Keltner, who was attending a patriot rally last weekend. New evidence in the case contradicts the narrative, as video shows that another man, Jeremiah Elliott, a BLM Antifa leader wearing a 'Black Guns Matter' t-shirt, was harassing the patriots, leading critics to question whether the shooting was a coordinated effort. Elliott immediately left the scene after the shooting, and appears to have been recorded saying "one less white supremacist" & "f**k yeah, right in the f***ing dome."

Several days ago, the Denver Post, under fire from social media, released two photos that they omitted in the series by photojournalist Helen Richardson; the critical photos appear to show Dolloff drawing his gun as his victim, Keltner, retreats.

The BLM/ Antifa counter protest group collected soup for homeless people, but video indicates that the leftists threw the cans at police
