

Australia Admits Widespread Severe Injuries From COVID Jab, Offers Compensation to Victims

written by GEG | January 2, 2022

Australia: The 7News station reported on Friday that as many as 79,000 people have suffered from severe side effects from the COVID jab, and the government is prepared to dole out over $600,000 in compensation for some victims. The news segment described how some people developed pericarditis and myocarditis shortly after taking the jab. Claims under $20,000 will need evidence from your doctor. Claims over $20,000 will be assessed by a team of legal experts. The highest figure reserved for only the most serious of cases.

UPDATE: A document from The Government of Australia outlines which injuries may be covered, including anaphylactic reaction, thrombosis, myocarditis, pericarditis, Guillain Barre Syndrome, and Thrombocytopenia. CLICK HERE for government document with attachments.

The Australian government admitted that the COVID-19 injection has resulted in tens of thousands of adverse reactions and is offering financial compensation to some victims, according to reports.

“Now the federal government is offering compensation for anyone who’ve become seriously ill after having their COVID shot,” the 7News reporter said.

The news segment described how some people developed pericarditis and myocarditis shortly after taking the jab.

“It’s estimated that 79,000 people have suffered adverse reactions to vaccines. Now the government’s offering compensation. Claims under $20,000 will need evidence from your doctor. Claims over $20,000 assessed by a team of legal experts. The highest figure reserved for only the most serious of cases,” the report explained.

Medical law expert Daniel Opare said expenses to deal with the jab’s adverse reactions can be costly.
