

Kansas: 10,000 Mysterious Cattle Deaths Blamed on 'Climate Change'

written by GEG | June 20, 2022

Kansas: Last Monday, an estimated 10,000 cattle reportedly died due to a high temperatures over 100 degrees with 18% to 35% humidity. Some reports blamed the deaths on lack of water and care for the cattle while others blamed extreme heat from climate change. It is curious that only cattle died, as there have not been any reports that humans or other animals died from the heat. Tennessee congressional candidate Robby Starbuck said that he spoke with multiple ranchers that insisted on the need for an investigation as they believe "there's no way heat caused 10,000+ cattle to drop dead." The deaths of the cattle coincide with numerous disasters at food production plants that affect the food supply chain.

The 10,000 cows died all at once because of heat story is just not adding up. Wait till you hear one of the possible theories behind this sudden mass death wave which according to David DuByne is a "statistical impossibility."

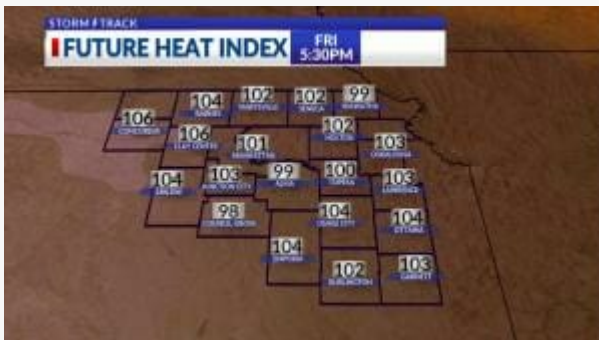

David DuByne and Mike Adams discuss the latest on this bizarre story plus a number of other food and world news events.

Cows have died before in a mass death wave in Cameroon in recent memory, but what you notice in that story is that people and animals both died, not just one air breathing species. The Lake of Death was due to a mass methane release which killed humans and animals alike, not just one set of 10,000 cows on one farm only.

That is what makes the Kansas mass cow death 10,000 all at once completely beyond normal scales suspicious for any clued in observers.

If the heat killed the cattle, why did people not also die? How does that make any sense? Was no human outside that day and did anyone die? So far no reports of any mass human death because of the heat, but could this be on its way. It is also totally implausible that this heatwave in Kansas so extreme that it could kill in this way.
