Last Sunday on 60 Minutes, Joe Biden declared that “the pandemic is over.” But the White House has since stepped in to clarify that this didn’t mean public emergency health powers were being relinquished. Despite Joe Biden declaring that “the pandemic is over,” the White House stepped in to clarify that this didn’t mean public emergency health powers were being relinquished.

Biden made the remarks during an appearance on 60 Minutes on Sunday.

“We still have a problem with Covid. We’re still doing a lot of work on it. It’s – but the pandemic is over,” he said.

Not for the first time, Biden’s statement was seemingly unplanned, and the White House rushed in to do damage control.

To no one’s surprise, the administration is refusing to give up powers it handed itself by imposing a Public Health Emergency, which will not be lifted.

“An administration official told CNN that the President’s comments do not mark a change in policy toward the administration’s handling of the virus, and there are no plans to lift the Public Health Emergency, which has been in place since January 2020 and is currently extended through October 13,” reports CNN.

In other words, technocratic control freaks will likely renew the powers for winter, during which a rough flu season due to lowered natural immunity and the return of another COVID variant will grease the skids for the latest round of the “100 per cent safe and effective” vaccine.

Biden’s remarks on 60 Minutes “caught some in the administration by surprise,” according to CNN, a regular occurrence whenever Biden veers slightly off script.
